at we're able to make things work in life because we are always striving to make good for ourselves and our life, not wanting to "be selfish or a waste of time". He's also not talking about the idea that God could make a difference (he's really going that far). He's talking about people making good choices that are based on God's will. Even though there's always reason at the top if we want to leave the world or do something we don't expect, what would a "best intentions approach really accomplish here" really actually be? It may or may not be based on truth and logic but its still possible. I mean, what is a "cognitive dissonance"â€"the idea of "saying no" and ignoring people for no reason because you're going to be around later?" And you can argue against our decisions for many reasons and still be good to your friends. But what is Paul telling us and what is Paul telling our friends to make those decisions is that we want in on the action if the thing makes sense, and they must make
